ADVICE TO

Owing to the prevalence of the corn o this past season Prof. A. G. McCall, agronomist at the College of Agriculture, Ohio State University, advises farmers of the State that it will be a wise precaution to avoid, as far as possible, the planting of corn in fields that were in corn last year. The cob rot is a fungous disease the spores of which survive in the soil over winter. Just how long they will retain their vitality has not been determined. Furthermore, since the di seased plants, which accumulate in the manure, will carry the spores of the fungus back to the soil, it is advisable to use all such manure on crops other other than corp. Prof. McCall states that an observance of these precauof disease which is considered to be a

It will pay for itself several times in one ear, in the increased fertility of the soil ad the greater crops that will result from its use. Sub-solling is one of the best things farmer can do. In a dry season the use of he sub-soli plow will help the farmer by providing a greater depth from which noi-ture can be drawn. In a wet season H nables the water to sink into the earth more quickly. In either case it is a bene fit. Crops like corn and the sugar beet will oot more deeply in the soil and thus be more able to resist drouth; besides, the air strengthen the growth of all the crops.

within the magns of every farmer. It does not require any special skill to operate it. Itst attach it to the plow, set the subsolier to the desired depth, hitch the team to it and use it as any other plow.

It is unnecessary to advance arguments to prove the value of sub-oiling. Every thoughtful farmer knows how greatly it would add to the producing power of his land if effectively done, iteratofore the process has been so expensive or the results on unsaftsfactory that but little progress has been made. This invention will enable to be done with but little more ishor and time than are necessary to break the land to the ordinary way. The tests which the oventors have made show that the work of the new instrument is very complete and that it leaves the sub-soil in fine condition. Almost all land is benefitted by sub-soil. When summer ruins fall on such and, the water only sinks as far as the she ground was plowed and is soon taken but by the heat of the sun.
